Jenkins is the founder of Trap Kitchen, a popular food truck that has been featured on national television and in publications such as The New York Times and The Los Angeles Times. But Trap Kitchen is more than just a food truck; it is a community center, a safe haven, and a place where young people can learn valuable life skills.

Jenkins grew up in poverty in Compton. His father was incarcerated, and his mother worked long hours to support the family. Jenkins was often left to fend for himself, and he quickly learned the hard realities of life on the streets.

As a teenager, Jenkins got involved in a gang and began selling drugs. But he knew that this was not the life he wanted. He wanted something more, something better.

One day, Jenkins was watching a cooking show on television. He was mesmerized by the way the chef prepared the food, and he felt a spark of inspiration. He realized that cooking was something he was good at, and he decided to pursue it as a career.

Jenkins started out by cooking for his friends and family. He would experiment with different recipes, and he quickly developed a reputation for his delicious food.

In 2012, Jenkins decided to take his cooking skills to the next level. He started a food truck called Trap Kitchen, and he quickly became a success.

Trap Kitchen's menu features a variety of dishes, including burgers, tacos, and ribs. But what sets Trap Kitchen apart from other food trucks is its commitment to giving back to the community.

Jenkins regularly donates food to local charities, and he also hosts cooking classes for underserved youth. He believes that food has the power to bring people together, and he is determined to use his platform to make a positive impact on the world.

Jenkins' story is one of resilience, determination, and the power of food to bring people together. He is an inspiration to young people everywhere, and his story is a reminder that anything is possible if you set your mind to it.
